fendant Brady Had Jurisdiction

Approved All that was Done by Defendant Brady.

He was a free and intelligent agent, and no indictment would lie for persuading him to act. The ratification and adoption of the acts of Brady by the Postmaster-General made all the said official acts and determinations of Brady in law the official acts of the Postmaster-General, and any abuse of discretion of Brady, if such there was, lost its character as such by the approval of the Postmaster-General of Brady's acts.

Questions of public policy and State necessity are not for the courts, but for the law-making branch of the Government.

the law-making branch of the Government.

An alleged abuse of discretion in a high executive officer, therefore, cannot be tried by the courts. To subject the superior officers of the Government, upon whose uninterrupted presence at the helm the safety of the State depends, to indictments for misconduct in office would be injurious to the body politic; and consequently in such cases impeachment is the sole instrument of penal revision. This principle applies to the executive officers, so far as such officers are clothed with discretion.

After all the acts mentioned in the information had been done, the Postmaster-General, as he was required by section—of the Revised Statutes, reported the matter complained of to Congress, which ordered an investigation and appropriated money to pay the sums in the information alleged to have been corruptly agreed to be paid. What is the legal effect of Congress' assent to the payment of the money, out of which the court is now asked to decide the United States was defrauded of?

It is true that the last section of the act appropriating money to carry out the Starroute contracts provides that it shall not affect the validity of the acts of officers, &c. If this section were not attached to the law, would the law operate to legalize from the beginning the alleged fraudulent contracts? There is do doubt of the power of Congress to cure or ratify illegal acts of public officers. (It is not conceded that these acts were illegal.)

Congress having supresse and exclusive jurisdiction over the appropriation of public and impolitic. The alleged impolitic use of public money is no more a judicial question than whether it can be used at all.

The courts can no more extend their jurisdiction over subject-matter not within it than they can extend it beyond its territorial limits.

Impeachment was the Only Remedy for these alleged acts of Gen. Brady, and after the tribunal that could impeach had investigated and confirmed the acts themselves, there was extracted from the whole transaction all the secretions of original sin selves, there was extracted from the whole transaction all the accretions of original ain or wrong in it.

As well might the courts, after a law is enacted by Congress, entertain a prosecution of individual Congressmen for an alleged abuse of individual discretion in voting for the law so passed. Or after a transaction, within the scope of Executive power, had reached the approval of the Executive head, the courts be permitted to scour along the line of the consummated transaction and subject the individual and subordinate agencies involved in the development of the matter to prosecutions for an alleged abuse of discretion for the part each, respectively played in the transaction, notwithstanding the sum of all officers acts stood approved by the highest executive authority.

There is Nothing Legally Offensive to the judicial sense in the claim that the moral or immoral status of the Star-route matters was subject to the action of Congress exclusively. For it is the supreme Constitutional privilege of Congress to determine what acts shall be criminal and what shall not be. So superior is the judgment of Congress, in the estimation of the law, over that of the courts, that Congress may elect to repeal a criminal statute while the courts are considering a crime perpetrated under the statute, and thereby suspend the prosecution and discharge the defendant.

In the law the highest sense of public good and of official propriety resides in the law of official propriety resides in the good and of official propriety resides in the law o defendant.

In the law the highest sense of public good and of official propriety resides in the law-making power. Because that department fixes standards by which all wrongs are measured and may change them at will, and release from crimes committed by repealing the statutes under which they were committed.

to do the acts complained of, and that he was fully authorized as an executive officer to consider and determine when, under the laws and rules of the Post-office Department, routes should be expedited. That being the case, the finding of Brady in that particular became the legal criterion of the existence of the necessary facts authorizing expedition, and such finding is conclusive upon the courts.
